

ANIMAL COMMUNICATION

FOUNDATIONS & DEVELOPMENT

Juggling Animals

Connecting when there are multiple animals in the home:

Typically the evidence that comes through is what tells you who you're connecting with. If I am doing a reading, and I'm intending to connect to only the black cat in the home, but the information coming through doesn't make sense about that cat, but the client does understand that info about another animal in the home, that tells me that that animal wants to talk instead.

We might set the intention of connecting to just one animal in the home, and we might connect heart to heart with that animal, but it's not as simple as calling that animal up on their cell phone. I like to think of it kind of like calling them on their landline (their home phone). That particular animal might pick up, but it's also a free for all for the rest of the animals that live their too, and those animals might really want to talk about what's going on for them. Even if I am only scheduled to connect to just one animal in the home, the others can often tell that there's a phone-line open.

So if I am doing a session for someone, I will always ask for the names of each animal that lives in the home, even if they're not the topic of the session, just because it helps me navigate it easier should those animals want to jump in on the conversation. I might feel drawn to one of the other names on my paper instead, and that tells me I might be connecting to them.

ANIMAL COMMUNICATION

FOUNDATIONS & DEVELOPMENT

Before I do a session, and I know I'll be connecting to multiple in the session, I will mentally connect to all of them beforehand, and ask them all to please give me lots of identifying info about themselves during our session so we can tell who is talking when, and I also invite them to share whatever they want with their human. But that step of asking them to share identifying info about themselves too, usually helps a lot. Then you might find that when you start each connection with each animal, they show you a fun little tidbit about themselves before they go into whatever topic they want to talk about. They might go "I'm the one who used to pee on the rug a lot!" and their humans usually know who we're talking to then =)

So animals can talk over each other. Sometimes that means you've switched animals mid-conversation, or it's a different animal than who you intended from the start. Again, typically you will see that in the information coming through. If it's several pieces of info in a row that does not ring true about who you intended to connect to, that's usually a good sign that it's a different animal connecting. If one animal is interrupting another one mid-connection, then usually if it feels like a different pace/rhythm or feels more out of the blue/sudden, those are also good signs that all of a sudden you have a different animal coming through. You can always ask the group of animals to please talk only one at a time (they might listen).

If you know there are multiple animals in the home, and you know you have time to connect to each one, then you can try connecting to each one briefly at the very start of the session to get a sense of their personalities and energy so it's easier to tell who is talking. You can place them around you mentally, so you can tell which one you're being drawn to. I always encourage you to go with the flow of the convo, so if you find that you're actually connecting to a different animal in the home, it's OK, it's not something you can necessarily control, in fact, the more you try to control it, the more you constrict the connection and get in the way, and you might find that there's a good reason for why this particular animal wants to talk to you first. Might be because of their personality (more outgoing, more talkative, likes to be center of attention or dominate), might be because they are a big part of the issues going on the home, might be because the animal you were supposed to talk to isn't as good a communicator, so you have a different animal wanting to speak for them, or it just might be because they have important things they need to communicate first. Usually if I have an animal take over a session when really I'm supposed to be talking to a different one, I try to let this animal talk and get everything they want to communicate out there, before I then move on to the one I'm supposed to talk to. Easier to go with the flow of it, and not assume you know what's best. Sometimes it's actually really helpful to talk to the other animals first, as maybe they are part of some of the issues going on the home. You might have an animal that's passed coming through too, who really wants to connect for their own reasons.

ANIMAL COMMUNICATION

FOUNDATIONS & DEVELOPMENT

If connecting to someone else's animals, it's easiest to navigate this sort of thing happening when your doing a reading for someone live and getting feedback from them live.

In the prerecorded modules, If you have a different animal connecting when you're doing the exercises in the modules, just go with it, and I will parse out who you're talking to based on the information you bring through. It is always absolutely OK if you end up connecting to a different animal in the home than the one intended.

Won't be random animals around off the street. The ones coming through in a session would be connected to the same human in some way, that's when they can tell a line of communication is open. Typically it's just the animals that live in the same home that would jump in on a convo.

If you yourself have multiple animals that you live with, and you want to connect to them, and want to be sure of who is connecting to you, you can always ask whoever is connecting to you to give you some identifying info about them that shows you who they are. If you suddenly see an image someone scratching the side of the couch, then you know you're connecting to the cat who loves to sharpen their claws on the couch.